The daring drama dramatizes the handsome hero, Farmer Al Falfa comfortably relaxing in soothing slumber. His attic bedroom is popularly inhabited by neighborly quadrupeds who play provoking pranks on Al. Milton, the leader of the mice, starts the day by tickling Al's foot with a wheat straw. He calls the gang to play leap frog across Al's bed and body into a nearby hole in the floor. But it only takes a short time for Al's trusty pet, Fannie, Cat to place an obstructing jug over the hole and capture all of the mice.

About this moment our feline heroine is attracted by the serenading music of Her Lover. She goes to the window and is assisted down to him by using the bars of his music. The lovers embrace and go on their way. It seems that Milton Mouse, the leader of the gang was still at large and observes the departure of Al's trusty pet. He hurries away to free his comrades and to celebrate, by raiding the champagne locker and the merry party consists of drinking, shouting and diving into the champagne. This seemed to cause a number of Milton's sturdy gang to feel a bit strong and they began to bounce Al's bed like a freman's blanket. Al woke up about his third trip into the air and missed his bed as the mice hurried it out of the room. Al lights nimbly, but flatfooted on the rough board floor and is greeted by further donations of missiles from "friend" mice. Al hurries away to plead with the picture of his angelic feline to return to him, but the continued bombarding of mice with stray bits of furniture and silverware halt his pleas. The plot was not thickening very fast, too fast to last, for it seemed that sufficient time had passed for the return of Al's pet to the homestead. The Mouse "Lookout" reports the homecoming and the army subsides, at the word from their commanding general. "Run for your lives, boys, she's coming back." The much disturbed Al was soon greeted by his pet and asked to "Meet the Husband" and later the "Family" which, as usual, is not small. The final fade leaves Al very happy amid the endearing kisses of the Cat Family. Al is now thoroughly convinced that "All's Well That Ends Well."
